It contains most of the features of the professional version but with fewer features and a simpler user interface. There are less than 50 editing tools, four basic paint palettes and five Basic Art brushes. These tools include various color filters, fill and mask types, and the clone stamp, the marquee tool and the spot healing tool. Using the tools, the user can create photos, design logos and cliparts, fix imperfections in photos and create images for web design and illustration. There is also a basic photo editor and a scrapbook for editing graphics. Also in the program is a font chooser with the download facility for high-quality font files. This is the code I use to check if there are any children: But it doesn't seem right because in this case the className of the element will be changed to some-class even if there are children. Is there an easy way to do that? Thanks!

A: To answer the second part of your question as to how to do this as a concise way, use the conditional operator, like this:

A: To expand on the answer from @Doug, there is a condition function that you can use.

```

A: You can't just add JSX elements without children. You have to add a return.

As a former Sock Hop host myself, I could only hope that a festival like the Sock Hop could provide comfort and succor to those in the progressive movement. Last night, I rode the hype train down and I was not disappointed. The stage was filled with great speakers who deserve to be talked about. The festival had many great themes and some that weren't as clear, but I urge you to listen to a few of the talks - you won't be disappointed. Opinion polls are notoriously unreliable things, but last night

I asked around and got what I was hoping for: the majority of young people attending Sock Hop were there because they believe the same things I do. So, what did I see from this festival?
